1. a. With reference to speech or writing: Force or vigour of expression.

[This sense (found in late L. and in Romanic) is originally derived from an imperfect understanding of Aristotle's use of ἐνέργεια (Rhet. III. xi. §2) for the species of metaphor which calls up a mental picture of something 'acting' or moving. In mod. use it blends with 3.]

6. a. Physics. The power of 'doing work' possessed at any instant by a body or system of bodies. First used by Young (with reference to sense 4) to denote what is now called actual, kinetic, or motive energy, i.e. the power of doing work possessed by a moving body by virtue of its motion. (Young expressed the quantity of 'energy' in a particle as the product of the mass into the square of the velocity; it is now found more convenient to express it as the half of this product.) Now extended (first by Rankine) to include potential, static, or latent energy, or energy of position, i.e. the power of doing work possessed by a body in virtue of the stresses which result from its position relatively to other bodies. Also with adjs., mechanical, molecular, chemical, electrical energy, etc.; atomic energy, see ATOMIC a. 2 d; radiant energy (see quots. 1901, 1942).

conservation of energy: the doctrine that the quantity of energy in any system of bodies cannot be increased or diminished by any mutual action of those bodies, and that the total energy in the universe is a constant quantity.

The energy..is now believed to take a form of waves of electric energy..and its amount is exactly equal to that which the hot body loses. 1936 Nature 25 Jan. 135/1 Mass and energy are equivalent, and mass is to be regarded in a sense as a concentrated source of energy. 1942 J. D. Stranathan Particles ix. 374 Although sufficient quantitative evidence has already been presented..to convince one of the interchangeability of mass and energy..when an electron and a positron combine the two masses disappear and there appears simultaneously a definite amount of radiant energy. 1956 G. Thomson Atom (ed. 5) xvi. 156 It is one of the consequences of the theory of relativity that mass and energy are closely connected, so closely that when one appears the other must disappear. Ibid. 161 Uranium..splits into two nuclei..with a diminution of mass and consequent release of energy.

†b. Suggested as a name for MOMENTUM.

3. One whose profession is the designing and constructing of works of public utility, such as bridges, roads, canals, railways, harbours, drainage works, gas and water works, etc. From 18th c. also civil engineer, for distinction from 2 b.

Not in Johnson 1755 or Todd 1818; the former has only the military senses, to which the latter adds 'a maker of engines', citing Bullokar. In the early quots. the persons referred to were probably by profession military engineers, though the works mentioned were of a 'civil' character. Since 2 b has ceased to be a prominent sense of engineer, the term 'civil engineer' has lost its original antithetic force; but it continues to be the ordinary designation of the profession to which it was first applied, distinguishing it from that of 'mechanical engineer' (sense 4). Other phraseological combinations, as electric (now usu. electrical), gas, mining, railway, telegraph engineer, are used to designate those who devote themselves to special departments of engineering.

4. A contriver or maker of 'engines'. The precise sense has varied from time to time in accordance with the development of meaning in ENGINE sb.; in present use the engineer in this sense (specifically mechanical engineer) is a maker of steam engines or of heavy machinery generally.

In this sense (but not in 3) the term is applied to the working artisan as well as to the employer of labour.

A. adj.

1. In early uses now only Hist. Often with ellipsis of pl. sb. as in 2 d.

When the adj. first occurs in OE., it had already lost its etymological sense 'of or belonging to the Angles' (as distinguished from Saxons). The earliest recorded sense is: Of or belonging to the group of Teutonic peoples collectively known as the Angelcynn ('Angle-kin' = Bæda's gens Anglorum), comprising the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, who settled in Britain during the 5th c. With the incorporation of the Celtic and Scandinavian elements of the population into the 'English' people, the adj. came in the 11th c. to be applied to all natives of 'England', whatever their ancestry. But for a generation or two after the Norman Conquest, the descendants of the invaders, though born in England, continued to be regarded as 'French', so that the word English, as applied to persons, was for a time restricted to those whose ancestors were settled in England before the Conquest. In formal state documents the distinction between the 'French' and 'English' inhabitants of England survived after it had ceased practically to exist; cf. ENGLISHRY.

1. a. The English language. First in the adverbial phrase, †on (now in) English. Also in phrase the King's, the Queen's English, app. suggested by phrases like 'to deface the king's coin'. Also attrib. as English scholar.

In 9th c., and prob. much earlier, Englisc was the name applied to all the Angle and Saxon dialects spoken in Britain. The name English for the language is thus older than the name England for the country. In its most comprehensive use, it includes all the dialects descended from the language of the early Teutonic conquerors of Britain; but it is sometimes popularly restricted to the language since the close of the 'Anglo-Saxon' or fully inflected stage; sometimes to the language and dialects of England proper, as distinguished from those of Scotland, Ireland, U.S., etc.; and sometimes to the literary or standard form of the language as distinct from illiterate or ungrammatical speech, etc.

[The use as sb. seems to have originated, not in the ellipsis of any particular word (e.g. ȝereord) meaning 'language', but in a vague absol. use of the neuter adj. A similar use is found in the other Teut. langs. and in Romanic; cf. Ger. auf deutsch, Fr. en français, Sp. en castellano.]

engrain, ingrain (ɛn-, ɪn'greɪn), v. Also 4 engreyne, 6 engrene. [f. EN-¹, IN- + GRAIN.

Palsgr. 1530 gives a Fr. engrainer to dye. The word, whether first formed in Fr. or Eng., was suggested by the Fr. phrase en graine (adapted in Eng. as in grain) where graine means the cochineal dye. Hence to engrain and to dye in grain meant originally to dye with cochineal, and subsequently to dye in any fast colour. But afterwards they came to be associated with the word grain, a. Fr. grain, the 'fibre' or minute structure of a thing; so that in mod. use 'to dye in (the) grain' means to impregnate the very substance of the material with the dye, to dye the wool before it is woven; and the present senses of the vb. engrain have distinct reference to grain 'minute structure.' On the whole the form engrain is now preferred to ingrain; see however the note on ENGRAINED ppl. a.] enough (ɪ'nʌf), a., sb., and adv. Forms: 1 ȝenóȝ, ȝenóh, 2–3 ȝenoh, (2 onoh), 2–5 inoch, 3 anoȝ, inouh, inooȝ, 3–5 in-, ynogh, -oȝ(h, -oh(g, -ouȝ, -owȝ, -ug(h, 4 enogh(t, -oȝ, -oh, enohw, ynowh, 5 inowhe, 6 in-, ynowghe, enohut, (4 anough, -ouȝ, inoht, inogh, 5 enoghe, ynought), 4–7 an-, in-, ynough(e, (4 ynowþȝ, 5 inowge, ynoughf, 6–8 enoff, inoffe, 6 yenough, 7 eno', -ouch, -out, 8 enought,) 7–8 enufe, -uff, 6- enough. Also north. 4–6 in-, yneuch, -ewch(t, (6 aneuch(e, -gh, en(n)ewche, 7 æneuche), 8–9 Sc. eneuch, -gh. See also ENOW[1]. [OE. ȝenóȝ, later ȝenóh adj. (used in acc. neut. as adv.), corresp. to OFris. enôch, OS. ginôg (Du. genoeg), OHG. ginuog (MHG. genuog, genuoc, mod.G. genug), ON. gnógr (Sw. nog, Da. nok), Goth. ganôh-s:—OTeut. ganôgo-z*, related to the impers. vb. (pret. -pres.) OE. ȝeneah, OHG. ginah, Goth. ganah 'it suffices', f. OTeut. ga-* (see Y-) + nah*, occurring also with different prefix in OE. beneah he enjoys, requires, Goth. binah it is right or needful. The OTeut. root nah*:—Aryan nak* appears also in L. nancisci (pa. pple. nac-tus) to obtain, Skr. naç to reach.

The earlier OE. form ȝenóȝ, and the forms with inflexional termination, have their normal phonetic representative in ENOW. In later OE. the ȝ when final after a long vowel became in most dialects h (= x), but when medial remained unchanged; thus in this adj. the nom. sing. and the acc. sing. masc. and neut. became ȝenóh, whence the mod. enough, while the nom. and acc. pl. were ȝenóȝe, yielding ENOW as their regular mod. form. Hence in many dialects, though not in all, the word enough (or its local equivalent), is employed in the sing. and in the advb. uses, while ENOW serves for the plural. In 18th c. this distinction was recognized (e.g. by Johnson) as standard English; now, however, enow is in literary use entirely superseded, exc. as an intentional archaism, by enough.

The frequent ME. forms with final t may possibly be due to influence of the ON. neut. gnógt; cf. however forms like boght for BOUGH, borcht for borch, BOROUGH, etc., where the t is merely excrescent.]

-ent, suffix, a. Fr. -ent, ad. L. -ent-em, the ending of pr. ppples. of vbs. of the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th conjugation, as rīdent-em, currentem, audientem. (In the ppples. of the 3rd and 4th conjugation this ending represents OAryan -nt-, or perh. -ent-, of the ablaut-series -ent-, -ont-, -nt-; cf. Skr. -ant-, -at-, Gr. -ovτ-, Goth. -and-, OE. -end-; in those of the 2nd conjugation it represents this suffix combined with the thematic -e- of the vb.; similarly the -ant- of the 1st conjugation includes a thematic -a-.) In OFr. this suffix and the corresponding -ant-em of the 1st conjugation were levelled under -ant, the sole ending of the Fr. pr. pple., as riant, courant, mourant, levant (:—L. levantem). At a later time many L. forms in -ent-, which had acquired an adj. sense, were adopted in Fr. as adjs. with the -ent- unchanged, as diligent, évident; some of these were duplicates of living ppl. forms in -ant, as convénient = convenant, provident = pourvoyant, confident = confiant. The Fr. words in -ant, -ent, which were adopted into Eng., have generally retained the form of the suffix which they had in Fr.; but since 1500 there has been a tendency to refashion them after Lat., and hence several words in -ant have changed that ending for -ent, either entirely or in certain senses. In mod.Eng. also many Lat. words in -entem have been directly adopted, always in the form -ent. The conflict between Eng. and Fr. analogies occasions frequent inconsistency and uncertainty in the present spelling of words with this suffix; cf. e.g. assistant, persistent; attendant, superintendent; dependant, -ent, independent.

2. In sense the words in -ent, -ant are primarily adjs., sometimes distinctly ppl., as convergent, obsolescent, errant, peccant; some, however, are, like many words of the same type in Lat. and Fr., used as sbs. (either in addition to the adj. use or exclusively), meaning (a) a personal agent, as agent, claimant, president, regent; (b) a material agent, as coefficient, current, ingredient, secant, tangent, torrent; esp. in Medicine, as aperient, astringent, emollient, expectorant.

In ME. the word was adopted as refl. and intr. with sense 'to introduce oneself, meddle'; in early mod. Eng. the sense 'interpose (something, or oneself)' was taken up from Fr., but rarely occurs. The verbs INTERMIT, INTROMIT, adapted from the original Lat. forms, were formerly often used in the senses of entremete, of which they may therefore to some extent be regarded as refashioned forms; now, however, they are used only in senses directly due to their Latin etymology.]

entitative ('ɛntɪtətɪv), a. Metaph. [ad. med.L. entitātīvus, f. entitāt-em: see ENTITY.]

1. Pertaining to the mere existence of anything. entitative act: transl. L. actus entitātīvus, a term used by the Scotists to denote 'material' as opposed to 'formal' or 'quiditative' actuality.

The word act in this phrase has its scholastic sense, 'that which differentiates an "actual" from a "potential" existence'. Duns Scotus, differing from Aquinas, recognized two kinds of 'act', i.e. two senses or degrees in which a thing might be said to have 'actual' existence: in one sense it is 'actual' if it simply possesses the 'matter' by virtue of which it has any existence other than merely potential; in the other sense, it is actual only when it possesses the 'form' which gives it specific existence. Hence in the language of his disciples the entitative act is the 'matter' of an actually existing thing, while the formal act is its 'form'; or, more accurately, they denote the possession of 'matter' and 'form' respectively.

[a 1308 DUNS SCOTUS Sent. XI. iii. §11 Uno modo actus est differentia entis opposita potentiæ..Alio modo actus dicit habitudinem illam quam dicit forma ad informabile et ad totum cujus est. 1520 LYCHETUS Comm. on Duns Scotus' Sent. II. xii. §19 Sicut forma est actus formalis quia potest informare per receptionem ipsius, ita etiam materia est actus entitativus.] c 1600 Timon IV. iii. entropy ('ɛntrəpɪ). Physics. [f. Gr. τροπή transformation (lit. 'turning'), after the analogy of ENERGY. First proposed by Clausius (1865) in Ger. form entropie.

Clausius (Pogg. Ann. CXXV. 390), assuming (unhistorically) the etymological sense of energy to be 'work-contents' (werk-inhalt), devised the term entropy as a corresponding designation for the 'transformation-contents' (verwandlungsinhalt) of a system.]

1. The name given to one of the quantitative elements which determine the thermodynamic condition of a portion of matter. Also transf. and fig.

In Clausius' sense, the entropy of a system is the measure of the unavailability of its thermal energy for conversion into mechanical work. A portion of matter at uniform temperature retains its entropy unchanged so long as no heat passes to or from it, but if it receives a quantity of heat without change of temperature, the entropy is increased by an amount equal to the ratio of the mechanical equivalent of the quantity of heat to the absolute measure of the temperature on the thermodynamic scale. The entropy of a system = the sum of the entropies of its parts, and is always increased by any transport of heat within the system: hence 'the entropy of the universe tends to a maximum' (Clausius). The term was first used in Eng. by Prof. Tait (see quot. 1868), who however proposed to use it in a sense exactly opposite to that of Clausius. In this he was followed (with an additional misunderstanding: see quot. 1875) by Maxwell and others; but subsequently Tait and Maxwell reverted to the original definition, which is now generally accepted.

1868 TAIT Sketch Thermodynamics 29 We shall..use the excellent term Entropy in the opposite sense to that in which Clausius has employed it—viz., so that the Entropy of the Universe tends to zero. 1875 MAXWELL Th. Heat (ed. 4) 189 note, In former editions of this book the meaning of the term Entropy as introduced by Clausius was erroneously stated to be that part of the energy which cannot be converted into work. The book then proceeded to use the term as equivalent to the available energy... In this edition I have endeavoured to use Entropy according to its original definition by Clausius. 1885 WATSON & BURBURY Math. Th. Electr. & Magn. I. 245 As in the working of a heat engine, the entropy of the system must be diminished by the process, that is, there must be equalisation of temperature. 1925 A. & J. enzyme ('ɛnzaɪm). [f. Gr. ἐν in + ζύμη leaven.]

1881 W. ROBERTS in *Proc. R. eotechnic (iːəʊˈtɛknɪk), a. [f. EO- + Gr. τεχνικός (see TECHNIC a. and sb.).] Denoting or belonging to the first stage of industrial development, when technical advances are first applied to the making of machines.

1934 L. MUMFORD Technics & Civilization iii. 109 The demonstration that industrial civilization was not a single whole..was first made by Professor Patrick Geddes... In defining the paleotechnic and neotechnic phases, he however neglected the important period of preparation, when all the key inventions were either invented or foreshadowed. So, following the archeological parallel he called attention to, I shall call the first period the eotechnic phase: the dawn age of modern technics. Ibid. 112 At the bottom of the eotechnic economy stands one important fact: the diminished use of human beings as prime movers, and the separation of the production of energy from its application and immediate control. 1954 J. A. C. BROWN Social Psychol. Industry i. 22 The eotechnic or medieval phase of industry stretches roughly from about A.D. 1000 to 1750.

-eous, suffix, occurring in adjs., is chiefly f. L. -e-us + -OUS. The Eng. words with this suffix are for the most part practically mere adaptations of L. adjs. in -eus, the senses of which they generally retain. While, however, the L. adjs. in -eus f. sbs. denoting material substances have usually the sense 'composed of', as well as the sense 'of the nature of, resembling', their Eng. derivatives in -eous express the latter meaning only: compare, e.g. argenteous, ligneous, vitreous, with the corresponding words in Latin. In a very few cases (e.g. aqueous) Eng. adjs. in -eous have been formed directly on L. sbs. The L. ending -eus also occurs as part of a complex suffix, as in the words in -āceus (see -ACEOUS) and -āneus (cf. consentaneous, instantaneous).

2. In beauteous, bounteous, duteous, plenteous, the ending -eous arises from the addition of the suffix -ous to -te, earlier form of -TY; but in the older words of this formation -teous replaces an earlier -tivous, f. Fr. -tif + -OUS; e.g. bounteous was originally bountivous, f. Fr. bontif, f. bonté: see BOUNTY.

3. In a few instances -eous is an analogical deformation of other suffixes, as in righteous (for rightwise), courteous, for ME. curteis a. OFr. curteis (-eis:—L. -ēnsem).

It does not appear that epicure as a common noun was ever current in Fr.; a single instance (pl. epicures, in sense 2) is cited by Godef. from the Tresor of Brunetto Latino (13th c.), who in an identical passage in one of his Italian works uses epicuri. The Italian lexicographers, however, suggest that the form epicuri, both in this case and in the two or three instances of 14–15th c. in which it is used for 'Epicureans', is a scribal error for the more usual epicurei or epicurii.]

1914 C. G. J. PETERSEN in Rep. Danish Biol. Station 1913 XXI. 16, I would therefore propose, that..we can distinguish between an In-fauna, which is connected with the ordinary, level, uniform sea-bottom,..and various On-faunas (epifaunas), which occur in connection with such objects on the sea-bottom as stones, piles, shells, rocks or plants; the occurrence of such epifaunas is dependent on the distribution of these objects in the bottom. 1951 *Arch. epigenesis (ɛpɪ'dʒɛnɪsɪs). Biol. [f. Gr. ἐπί upon + γένεσις generation: see GENESIS. The word is used by W. Harvey, Exercitationes 1651, p. 148, and in the English Anatomical Exercitations 1653, p. 272. It is explained to mean 'partium super-exorientium additamentum', 'the additament of parts budding one out of another'.] The formation of an organic germ as a new product; theory of epigenesis: the theory that the germ is brought into existence (by successive accretions), and not merely developed, in the process of reproduction. Also fig.

The opposite theory was formerly known as the 'theory of evolution'; to avoid the ambiguity of this name, it is now spoken of chiefly as the 'theory of preformation', sometimes as that of 'encasement' or 'emboîtement'.

Hence epi'somal a., pertaining to or having the character of an episome; epi'somally adv., by means of or as a result of episomes.

1960 *Bacteriol. [1849 F. ADAMS Genuine Wks. Hippocrates II. Aphorisms vii. no. 35 When the scum on the surface is fatty and copious, it indicates acute diseases of the kidneys. [Note] It appears from Galen, that in some copies he found epistasis, and in others hypostasis; the one evidently referring to the scum on the surface, and the latter to the sediment: he favours the former reading, and understands it to refer to melting of the fat in the neighbourhood of the kidneys.]

1807 MORRIS & KENDRICK Edin. Med. & Physical Dict. II. Gloss., Epistasis, see Epischesis [= 'a suppression of excretions']. Also the substance on the surface of the urine. 1848 in DUNGLISON. 1889 in Cent. Dict. 1934 in WEBSTER; and in mod. med. dicts.

Const. to, on, over. (Opp. to HYPOSTATIC a. 3.)

1907 W. BATESON in Science 15 Nov. 653/2 Till lately we spoke of the relations between the gray color of the mouse to the black color in terms of dominance. Those terms, strictly speaking, should only be applied to members of the same allelomorphic pair. We can perhaps best express the relation between the gray and the black by the use of the metaphor 'higher and lower', and I therefore suggest the term epistatic as applicable to characters which have to be, as it were, lifted off in order to permit the lower or hypostatic character to appear. 1909 —— Mendel's Princ. Heredity ii. 41 (Primula). The magenta shades have a factor epistatic to crimson and pink. Ibid. v. 98 The pale ivory is due to a factor epistatic on the bright yellow. 1910 L. DONCASTER Heredity vi. 75 The presence of a higher member of the series obscures or prevents the development of the lower. This is expressed by saying that grey is 'epistatic' over black and chocolate, and black over chocolate. 1949 DARLINGTON & MATHER Elements of Genetics vii. 157 A gene removing an organ is.. obviously epistatic to one modifying that organ. 1968 M. W. STRICKBERGER Genetics xv. 239 Epistatic or interaction effects are also known..in which the phenotypic expression caused by one pair of genes depends upon alleles at another gene pair.

6. a. concr. A formula affirming the equivalence of two quantitative expressions, which are for this purpose connected by the sign =.

The two chief kinds of equations are: (1) Those which contain symbols denoting one or more unknown quantities; to discover the numerical values of these is called 'solving' the equation; the numbers which will 'satisfy' an equation, i.e. which may be substituted for the symbol of unknown quantity without rendering the statement incorrect, are called its 'roots'. (2) Those which indicate a constant relation existing between variables; as equation to a curve, an equation expressing a relation between coordinates or the like, which is constant for every point in the curve; equation of motions, etc. Equations are distinguished as simple, quadratic, cubic, biquadratic, etc. (or as of the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, etc. degree) according to the highest power which they contain of any unknown or variable.
